Abstract. This paper focuses on the relationship between law and language in the Information Society. Information, indeed, is thought to be the new keyword of our Age, therefore it endorses Heidegger's prediction about its increasing role, that is able to "unify the human and the natural sciences into a common theoretical framework". Starting from this assumption which will be discussed further on, this work aims on the one hand to underline the theoretical nature of the link, understood in its connection with language between techne and thought, and on the other hand, to analyze the legal language from the latest puzzling issues of liability in law – i.e. ISPs' liability, neuroscience and responsibility – in order to underline the codependence between law and language.
